

Turner hosts student trip to construction site

Students from Auburn University's Building Sciences program learned about career opportunities in the construction industry while touring an active construction site in Atlanta in October. Thanks to Turner Construction, which is managing the project, the students received a first-hand look at the new G. Wayne Clough Undergraduate Learning Commons on the Georgia Institute of Technology (GA Tech) campus.

The students are members of the Auburn student chapter of the Associated General Contractors of America (Alabama chapter). The AGC is the nation's largest and oldest construction trade association, providing building science students with activities that complement their in-class curriculum.

The Clough Commons will be a general classroom building for thousands of students studying physics, chemistry and biology.